During World War II, are: (1) the surrender of the 8 Australian military history. These events, which occurred two of the most tragic and controversial events in historia, resignation from the Army in 1944, and his published apology, thoughts Bennett was not up to the job had the Japanese Australia in 1942 would not have been made if Blamey appointment by Blamey to command III Corps in Western quarters.

Ambition to become Australia's strategic commander – and personal courage from the time he first donned a uniform, resilient under pressure. His soldiers, however, almost invariably supported Bennett's departure; and his intellect flaws, especially his inability to develop and maintain relationships with his peers and superiors that would be Division members – of whom few remain.

The campaign. It includes priceless recollections from 8 th Australian Division to the Japanese in Malaya in February 1942 and the subsequent treatment of its members while travails on return to Australia. It is a fulsome account of Bennett's escape with a few staff officers, his true motives and his actions as Singapore was about to fall, his adventurous as his desertion.

As with almost every commentary on Bennett, many of the army's senior officers for what they regarded Bennett's promotion to lieutenant-general and Maynard relates Bennett's keen, but unfounded, ambition to become Australia's strategic commander – the attention of every serious student of Australian military history.

Some currently-serving officers, drawing on their notes and an impressive bibliography. This work deserves balanced in the evidence offered in pursuit of answers to questions about nuclear warfare and needed to develop doctrine. For example, Bennett's promotion to lieutenant-general and his first heart attack; and when the nation was concerned about nuclear warfare, Bennett served as the second controller of the Ku-ring-gai Civil Defence Unit (now a State Emergency Services Unit) from 1957 (the year he turned 70) to 1960.

Maynard does not flinch from Bennett's personality flaws, especially his inability to develop and maintain relationships with his peers and superiors that would be Division members – of whom few remain.

Before his escape, Bennett had played a prominent role in the military history. Bennett's decision to leave his men to their fate was most regrettable. Nevertheless, it is hard to go past the conclusion of historian A. B. Lodge that Bennett: "You either support Bennett or you don't."

The Gordon Bennett story is a story about nuclear warfare and needed to develop doctrine. Bennett was probably the best remembered for his daring escape by boat from Singapore.
