Voices in a collection of over 400 modern Jewish poets from over 40 nations. In 1980 – thirty-six years ago – Anthony Rudolf and I published Voices Within the Ark: The Modern Jewish Poets. It’s a hefty book arranged in four sections – Hebrew, Yiddish, English and Other Language poets, 400 of them, in 1200 pages. It was the first and last book of its kind since the 1920s. Voices Within the Ark has been out of print a long time, but somehow most Jewish poets seem to have a copy. I know that the poets included were happy to be part of this family of poets. We hope that a younger editor will take up where we left off. Please read our final poem featured for Jewish Poetry Month, Howard Schwartz’s – “Yehuda Amichai in the Heavenly Jerusalem,” from his book of poetry, Breathing in the Dark, 2011. Voices Within the Ark, together with Ruth Finer Mintz’s Modern Hebrew Poetry: A Bilingual Anthology (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1966) and T. Carmi’s The Penguin Book of Hebrew Verse (Harmondsworth: Penguin Books, 1981) are of great assistance to the English reader who wishes to experience the delights of Hebrew poetry in translation. I exit with these lines from a light soufflé of mine called – “Honoured” in which, after reflecting on male circumcision, I raise the question

Harold Bloom's critique of "Voices Within the Ark" (Jan. 4) does not illuminate adequately either the anthology under review or the more intriguing question: "Why isn't modern Jewish poetry better?" "Voices Within the Ark" is the first Jewish anthology in English to celebrate the presence of 350 modern Jewish poets in various languages. That few of the poets will join the canon of universal art should come as no surprise. Mr. Bloom holds little hope for modern Jewish poetry because his vision of Judaism is trapped in static traditionalism and his esthetic perspective does not breach Western cultural history. The "burden of the past," he believes, drowns the would-be Jewish poet today. But why has it not affected contemporary Jewish prose writers, plastic artists or Jewish composers?
