fddi a high speed network

FDDI stands for Fiber Distributed Data Interface. It is a high-speed, high-bandwidth network based on optical transmissions. It is most often used as a network backbone, for connecting high-end computers (mainframes, minicomputers, and peripherals), and for LANs connecting high-performance engineering, graphics, and other workstations that demand a rapid transfer of large amounts of data. It can transport data at a rate of 100 Megabits per second and can support up to 500 stations on a single network. FDDI: A High Speed Network. The Computer Journal, Jan 1994. Sobczak, R. Tweet. It is mainly used as a network backbone connecting two or more LAN segments. A simple backbone might connect two servers through a high-speed link consisting of network adapter cards and cable. Fiber channel refers to a relatively new technology with the most common usage being in connecting clustered servers in distributed computing environment. FDDI and Fiber channel support data transmission speeds of 100 Mbps. This technology may be a choice in connecting information systems of partnering companies in Virtual manufactu
