Method III requires the handcoding of a grammar and the semantic patterns used by its parser, but not the handcoding of any lexical material. This is because the method builds up lexical material from sources wholly within LDOCE. The information extracted is a set of sources of information, individually weak, but which can be combined to give a strong and determinate linguistic data base. It has long been claimed that there is no lexical field of smell, and that smell is of too little validity to be expressed in grammar. We demonstrate both claims are false. The Cha'palaa language (Ecuador) has at least 15 abstract smell terms, each of which is formed using a type of classifier previously thought not to exist.

REVIEW ARTICLE A GRAMMAR OF CONTEMPORARY ENGLISH¹ Harold V. King University of Michigan The publication of this important volume fills the need for an up-to-date survey of. The first chapter takes a quick look at some of the diverse meanings of the word grammar and then takes up the question of dialects and other kinds of variation within the language, including not only the usual geographical and cultural dimensions but also stylistic variation, the whole matter being presented logically and succinctly with well-chosen examples.
