Political Economy of State Building Understanding Inclusive State Building. Many policy initiatives (like the poor laws) came from society, many state building initiatives were demanded, not initiated by national elites. E.P. Thompson emphasized the "moral economy" or 18th Century Britain, a nexus of social norms which elites had to respect or face riot and rebellion + social norms embedded in the common law. Another more basic reason for top-down regimes not building state capacity is related to the "political losers" mechanism highlighted above.

Over time, existing policies develop their own encrustations of institutions, vested interests, adaptive preferences, and expectations that render the trajectory of getting from here to there a major part of the policy challenge. The long fight to end slavery, led by William Wilberforce, among many others, culminated in Britain with the enactment of the Slavery Abolition Act in 1833. This is the focus of my recent book, Dealing with Losers: The Political Economy of Policy Transitions (Oxford University Press, 2014; now available in paperback, 2015). A few selective, but far from exhaustive, examples serve to illustrate this point.
